

Europe's most threatened archaeological sites and landmarks

Fourteen of Europe's endangered cultural and historic sites have been shortlisted for a rescue mission by heritage body Europa Nostra. Tell us what you think of the list, and any other sites you'd like to see saved

Thursday 18 April 2013 11.14 BST

Berlin's gaslights, an Italian Renaissance monastery and a historic Turkish city don't have much in common on the face of it, but all three are under threat and have been placed on a list of threatened European landmarks.

A total of 14 archaeological sites, religious buildings, historic city centres, and military fortifications have been shortlisted by Europa Nostra for 7 Most Endangered, a European heritage initiative devised to help save some of Europe's most threatened places.

The 14, selected by experts from a total of 40 nominations submitted by public bodies and organisations across 21 countries, will be whittled down to seven for the final list, to be announced at Europa Nostra's 50th Anniversary Congress in Athens on 16 June.

Here' the full list of places. What do you think of the list? And is there anywhere you think should be on it?

Gaslights and gas lamps in Berlin, Germany

These romantic, historically valuable and perfectly functioning gas street lights have been part of Berlin's cityscape for almost 200 years. Today no other city in the world has preserved gas lights to such a scale. The proposed replacement of gas lights with electric lighting is opposed by the local community and numerous tourists who are strongly attached to the existing lamps.

UM DEN VOLLSTÄNDIGEN ARTIKEL ZU LESEN KLICKEN SIE AUF DIESEN LINK:

<http://www.guardian.co.uk/travel/2013/apr/18/europe-most-threatened-sites-landmarks>